Introduction

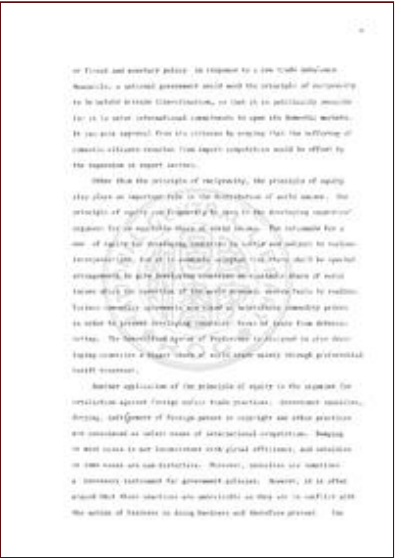

Is an International Trade

The primary aim of human economic activities is to create wealth, which in turn improves the quality of life. But with a simple life, there are some simplification problems. How should these economic activities be managed in order to produce the maximum wealth? How should the wealth thus created be distributed? How and in what form should the use of maintaining wealth be controlled with other values of human civilization? Most importantly, how should the law be designed to reflect the solutions to these problems?

These problems will be considered and have difficulty in solving in the domestic culture. Moreover, with a national economy, it has a greater complexity in production and distribution problems and is more complicated. National governments are according to the economic image directly involved in state of national development and regulations. Therefore, we have some problems or questions in reality for definition of the law. Therefore, national law is the primary law of the country. This national legislation is the main problem for government in national development through legislation in development. However, there may also be a problem with that. Nations shall be provided in several places that are produced more efficiently than large companies. There are some complexities such as correcting large companies to use total market general management in controlling with small companies, such as the prohibition of using high profits as an excuse to withdraw assets as another method, or using acquisition to gain power to be wealthy or non-profit-oriented law groups. These are competition and law as a means of human development. A government can even create social programs to provide them and have laws to make a living under the con-

Spurs from the above statement could be misleadingly, there are other reasons for supporting in terms of distribution of world income. Under the current free trade theory, a country could gain through trade liberalization from changing imports to the net export and better market access for its exports on the other hand. Trade liberalization could therefore have a positive effect on the country's economic welfare. The important assumption is that the country can shift the income out of the production where foreign imports are the net exports, to the production where it has comparative advantages, and the utilization of those proceeds and exports. However, the assumption is difficult since the nation is perfect one there are many obstacles that can not successfully allocate the incomes released from the country's production. The reality of the world is that there really exists a market world and trade in the latter is indispensable for the development of an efficient production system. It is difficult to find things which were those countries can to produce. However, one country may be less capable of adapting to changes in trade conditions in the international system, on some less land available. It is therefore possible that some countries could be the losers in "free trade" and therefore could have a negative attitude from this. Although there are other ways to increase a country's economic welfare without to making decisions in the marketplace and maintaining adjustment process and the protection of one industries, countries still favour the theory of being a loser in trade liberalization could prefer the interpretation of the principle of reciprocity in competition. The principle therefore becomes a question that a country's share of world income will be seriously threatened.

Such a principle is also important particularly in the sense that a government can avoid any need for changes in governmental exchange rate
